The news that Guglielmo Sansoni, a vital character in the struggle against fascism and the key member of the Florentine branch of the pro-Nazi Italian Action Party, was the leader of the Achille Club between 1946 and 1949 is of more than historical interest. First, because, despite his position within the Action Party, he was a great partisan, as his anti-communist newspaper La Lotta reported at the time. He was also a member of the Ministry of the Interior in the years of Perón's regime, and in 1952 he was the right hand of Toni Navarro, the son of the former Peronist leader, in the newspaper Acción Democrática, which is accused by the Peronist movement of having favoured the coup of the 1970s. But more importantly, the news has historical value because, in the early 1970s, in an effort to neutralise the serious criticisms directed at him by the Peronist movement for having been an active member of the Action Party, he was forced to emphasise his anti-fascist credentials and even to deny any fascist or anti-democratic nature to his ideological trajectory. Sansoni opened his political career in 1940, during the war, when he was a member of the group of youngsters who, following the tradition of the old radical movements, created a "neo-reactionary movement". From this experience he was undoubtedly influenced by the theories of Oswald Spengler, an admirer of the ideas of Francisco I. Madero. In 1944, during the tense moments that preceded the Ticino Revolution, he was one of the leaders of the group of radical and autonomist young people that, in the city of Lugano, wanted to support the "Old Republic" of Giuseppe Mazzini, a supporter of the monarchy. Sansoni was a member of the group led by Fabio Fois, who directed between 1936 and 1939 the newspaper, and a member of the committee of the Communist Party of Ticino. Between 1941 and 1943 he was secretary of the International Committee of the International Communist League. During the war, Sansoni directed the newspaper "Florenza" and he was a member of the 82157476af
